To Whom It May Concern:

It is my understanding that there is a push to further regulate or to fully ban the use of outdoor wood furnaces. I think this is outrageous! I own 100 acres of land in Willington, Ct, and there for I own 100 acres of land with standing timber on it. I use my outdoor wood burning furnace to heat my home, my barn, and all of the hot water for each. I have a large home and a large family, and with out having to purchase oil for the past 3 years I have well enough paid for my outdoor furnace and still have savings to show. I am outraged with the idea that with all of the regulations that local and state government have imposed on every home owner, they are now going to try and make it harder or even get rid of a home heating system that has potentially saved thousands of dollars for some people. People have been burning wood to heat their homes since fire was invented. This is a very renewable resource, and as for me I will be able to heat my home for as long as I would like to for very little money. And, for the people whom might have to purchase their wood, they are most likely getting it locally, which in turn is helping our local community businesses. This regulation or ban is just another slap in the face as far as I am concerned.
